This is a training for ethically and clinically working with transgender and non-binary clients. This training objectives are to understand the presentation of gender dysphoria diagnosis with children, adolescents and adults; understand the continuum of gender identity; understand co-occurring disorders with gender dysphoria including bipolar disorder, GAD, depression, substance abuse, eating disorders and more; learn the difference between body dysphoria and gender dysphoria and how they can be related and learn the three clinical modalities directly related to gender dysphoria and how to implement them using gender affirming treatment including solution focused therapy, mindful self-compassion and CBT.
This workshop is geared for social workers in direct practice who want to deepen their understanding of social work as a human rights profession and to increase their effectiveness at promoting their clients’ human rights. This workshop will focus on social work’s cardinal ethical principles of social justice, dignity, integrity, and competence—and connect them to human rights principles of transparency, nondiscrimination, and participation. Participants will become familiar with the core human right principles of human dignity, nondiscrimination, participation, transparency, and accountability; understand the relationship between these principles and core social work values; know the history of social work as a human rights profession and learn eight methods for putting human rights into social work practice.
SEX THERAPY 101

3.0 Core Hours

Presenter: Kate Morrissey Stahl, PhD, MSW, MA LCSW
AASECT Certified Sex Therapist

In this workshop, insights from Barry McCarthy’s books Sex Made Simple and Rekindling Desire will be shared, along with case examples from the presenter’s practice as an AASECT-certified sex therapist. This training will help practitioners to build a baseline of sexual knowledge to consider assessing common sexual issues and keeping sex as a point of discussion in therapy, even if is not central to the practitioner’s clinical work. Participants will know what important questions they might ask to assess for sexual issues in individual and couple therapy, as well as in case management; will understand Barry McCarthy’s basic principles of sex therapy; be able to apply the PLISSIT model of sex therapy to decide on appropriate levels of care; to model asking sexual questions in helpful ways and be aware of the steps of AASECT Certification.

Reflective Structured Dialogue (RSD) builds the capacity of communities and organizations to engage, live and thrive despite their differences. By enabling people to have new conversations about the issues that matter deeply to them and remain in relationship, the approach creates a foundation for trust, resiliency and collaborative action. These skills are critical for helping social workers work in difficult situations. Participants will be asked to reflect on why organizations & communities must develop the capacity to have difficult conversations on polarizing issues; learn the basic theory and practice of reflective structured dialogue; experience a reflective structured dialogue; learn how RSD leads to the creation of an environment where participants can have difficult conversations; enhance understanding of conflict, polarization, and change and explore how you might use RSD or aspects of RSD in communities and organizations.
